An Epitome of the Dicta of Fashionable Modistes.

The Reign of the Blouse Waist Said to Be Drawing to a Close—Street Gowns of Very Pretty Design—Millinery Novelties.

Special Chicago Letter.

Is the blouse really going out of fashion? The feminine world stands with bated breath waiting for those high in authority who are supposed to decide all such important questions to give out their verdict.

A glance through the shops shows this cherished garment to have the warm support of several well-known dress-makers, who, while admitting that it has seen its most glorious day, yet declare it will remain a prominent feature in the domain of fashion for a long time to come.

On the other hand, equally reliable authorities in the modiste field consider it passe, excepting, perhaps, for evening wear, and loudly proclaim the Louis Seize coat-basque to be its immediate successor. One may well ask who shall decide when doctors disagree. If Dame Fashion elects that we shall give up this most useful and beloved of all garments it will be a matter of congratulation if its mantle of popularity should, by any manner of means, fall on the dainty little Louis Seize coat, which is capable of innumerable adaptations and endless variations, and is equally charming whether made of plainest cloth or costliest velvet. The fancy of the moment is that it shall match the material of the skirt.

The color chosen in this particular case was a deep rich damson—a most fashionable shade, by the way—the short coat-basque sloping away in front from a full-pointed vest of cream-tinted cloth with a small jabot of lace at the throat. Narrow bands of elchichilla fur passed over the shoulders, while the deep flaring cuffs which served to ornament the immense sleeves were trimmed with bands of the same fur and edged with full frills of lace hanging over the hand. I might mention right here that all the lace sleeves, when not cut long enough in themselves to partially conceal the hand, are invariably given a trimming with this purpose in view.

I think perhaps the most striking feature in costumes intended for mid and late winter wear is the elegant materials used in their construction. So far has this craze for rich, not to say gorgeous, effects been carried that even the tailor-made gown has had to succumb to its baleful influence. However, this is a cloud with a silver lining, and we should rejoice accordingly; for while the severely plain tailor-made costume had a particularly modish air, quite irresistible in its way, the majority of women found it extremely trying to both face and figure, and its most ardent admirers never really claimed it to be generally becoming.

The faces of most women, in fact I might say all women, to be at their best require the softening effect of lace and bright ribbons as adornment; and with the strictly tailor-made gown of cloth such dainty garniture was not permissible. To-day the proper, up-to-date dress for shopping and general wear is either of printed velveteen or corduroy, the preference being given to the latter.

The fashionable color at present for these gowns is a rich, dark shade of green. They are made with a full gored skirt and tight-fitting jacket ornamented with carved porcelain buttons and finished at the neck by a feather ruche, or else the short coat opens over a chamois leather vest covered with soutache braiding, with a high stock collar of velvet draped with square tabs of lace. These dresses are at once dressy-looking and suitable for any ordinary occasion, and best of all, their wearing quality is well-nigh everlasting if the best corduroy is chosen. Another model for a street toilet is shown in the picture made of two face cloth, velvet and lace being used as garniture. The very full skirt shows a hem of velvet, dark brown in color, while the snug-fitting short jacket shows a touch of the same in the pointed revers and draped collar. The hat accompanying this rather fetching costume is a dark brown felt with the flaring brim lined with velvet. Loops and bows of velvet ribbon trim the crown, while on one side are placed ostrich tips held in position by two diamond buckles. This gown would be decidedly chic if fur were used instead of velvet, the whole being surmounted by a dashing Tam O'Shanter hat of cloth caught down at the side by a small milk head.

There is nothing strikingly novel in evening and reception dresses this season. They are mostly fashioned in some pretty, simple manner, depending for style on the elegance of the material, the cut and finish of the superbly hanging skirt and the perfect-fitting bodice. There is a decided tendency toward trimmed skirts in all gowns and especially those for evening wear; and just now the popular fancy is the panel trimming. The panels are usually outlined with jet or galloon and are placed on the front and side gores of the skirt. This is a particularly effective and charming mode of garniture when the panel happens to be of lace showing a bright color beneath.

Lace will be much used this winter on both outdoor and home attire. It is an extravagant fashion, but a pretty and becoming one. Of course, the genuine article is the most desired and lovely, but it is not all of us who are the happy possessors of lace heirlooms, and we must perforce content ourselves with the imitation. But nowadays imitation is almost equal to the real article, and especially is this true of lace. Within the week I have seen some really exquisite machine-made lace which it would be impossible for anyone but an expert to tell from the genuine. Meehlin is one of the laces easy of reproduction, and is a prime favorite just now. It has a wonderfully pretty effect on velvet, and is quite as pleasing on cloth, but the best dressmakers do not use it at all on silk, preferring fine Valenciennes with small leaf pattern. As the evenings grow shorter we value the teagown more and more, and, however fashion may wax and wane, this useful garment, like the poor, is always with us. It is, of all gowns, the most capable of variety, and when becoming, makes a beautiful woman more beautiful, and a plain woman grows really attractive under its benign influence. A teagown should not be too elaborate, neither should it err on the side of too much simplicity. To strike the happy medium is somewhat difficult, but there are two things one should always insist upon—a silken lining and a perfect fit. One of the prettiest materials for this ideal garment is crepe de chine, but for winter wear something heavier, like velveteen, is more suitable.

The gown in the picture shows a handsome and becoming model and one particularly pleasing if made of velveteen. The front is cut princess shape and the back a la Watteau. A narrow band of fur at the wrist furnishes the full bishop sleeve, while passing down the front is a stole-like arrangement of the velveteen, edged with fur, which gives that peculiarly easy, graceful appearance so indispensable to the correctly-made modern tea-gown. I saw a tea-gown the other day which was quite a novel idea in its way, simply because it was constructed out of an old evening dress, and the result reflected a great deal of credit on the ingenuity and excellent taste of the designer. She—of course it was a woman—had cleverly filled up the low-cut bodice with a yoke of cream-tinted lace, while over the shoulders she had placed scarves of black chiffon which reached to the hem of the gown, both back and front. The short puffed sleeves were prettily lengthened by full frills of chiffon, while a jeweled girdle concealed the necessary piecing at the waist. It seldom repays one to "make over" an old garment, but in this case the end certainly justified the means.

From glimpses I caught—for I really had not time to properly study them—I found bonnets and hats to vie with each other in gay and variegated trimming, and that a deep red and wonderful purple will be the favorite colors during the rest of the season. The trimming on all the newest bonnets is placed all on one side. A lovely pattern bonnet made of purple velvet had the crown encrusted with jet, while on the left side were two sable tails and a jetted osprey. This was its sole garniture, and it looked rather odd after the two-sided trimmings which have been en vogue.

A picture hat of pleasing detail of which I send you a copy was made of black silk beaver and trimmed with clusters of feathers, while beneath the brim, both in back and front, were rosettes of shaded pink velvet.
